Postings

-- I would like for our discussions to be open and easy for all of us to understand so we can really talk to one another as if we are in class and face to face. Please make sure your postings are in your own words and target an audience that has no clue what you are talking about --- no clinical answers or answers from online or print resources. If someone else posts something and you don't really understand their comments, ask! That's the best way for everyone to learn. Let's have some FUN with this!

If you want to make sure you are not plagiarizing the answer, you may want to run it through <http://www.duplichecker.com/> . As you move forward in your education this is a valuable resource. There are others out there, but this is the one I used with my research proposal for my Masters and it never let me down. If you do need to use information you found online or in print, please cite (I'm not asking for a formal citation) where you found it. You might say... I found this on Wikipedia (keep in mind the info on this site is posted by everyday folks like you and me for the most part so it may not be as accurate as you hoped for). You might even say we discussed this in another one of my classes and Mr. X said.....
